

NY ATM Boosts Revenue Through Bitcoin Depot® Partnership

THE PARTNER

For years, Jon Weilbaker had been looking for a sustainable, yet lucrative way to make a living in New York City. When he co-founded NY ATM with his wife Patricia Tuz in 1998, he initially intended for the venture to supplement his career at the time as an accounts specialist in a corporate advertising firm.

Weilbaker remembers approaching one of his first clients during the beginning stages of NY ATM: “One day, I noticed that there was a drugstore across the street from my house, so I approached the store owner and asked him whether he would be interested in installing an ATM,” he said. “The owner expressed that he was, and next thing you know, we were already beginning to make money from this partnership.”

He eventually managed to transform NY ATM into a full-time venture due to its steadily growing clientele base, which ranges from convenience stores to pharmacy chains.

THE CHALLENGE

By the time COVID hit the U.S. in March of 2020, Weilbaker began to consider other ways he could expand his reach at NY ATM by helping retailers install new products for their customers.

Just one month prior to the lockdown, he met Bitcoin Depot® Business Development Manager Mark Smith at ATMIA, a financial technology focused annual conference. As someone who had been interested in crypto for years, Weilbaker was intrigued by the idea of incorporating Bitcoin ATMs into his repertoire of offerings for retailers but didn’t know where to start.

“There were maybe five or six different Bitcoin companies I spoke to at ATMIA, but based on my meeting with Mark, I decided to take a chance on Bitcoin Depot®,” Weilbaker said. “He seemed open and honest throughout the conversation, which made me feel good about moving forward with the partnership.”

“I was also very impressed with how seriously Bitcoin Depot® takes compliance compared to some of the other companies I have spoken with,” he added.
